Neuguest," or "The Glory of the King." It is in an ancient language, unknown to the Emperor Menelik and the vast majority of his subjects, and is guarded with exceeding jealousy by the priests who understand it.

Magda, Queen of Sheba, so runs this ancient narrative, arrives in Jerusalem, and is immediately struck with admiration at the wonders which she sees there, her astonishment being only surpassed by her rapturous delight in the presence of King Solomon.

"My lord," she says, "you are happy, for you are showered with knowledge and wisdom. I would have wished to be in your palace, the humblest of your servants, so that I might have washed your feet, listened to your words and obeyed them. How happy I am when you ask me questions, and when you reply to me! . . . I behold light in the darkness, the pearl in the sea, the morning star in the midst of the constellations, the moon's ray in the morning. This is why I glorify Him who has led me here, Him who has permitted your Majesty to be revealed to me, Him who has caused me to walk before your house and hear your voice."

King Solomon is almost as modest in his reply, acknowledging that all his wisdom comes from God. "I am not the Master," he says. "I exist not by means of myself, but by His will. It is through Him that I speak, walk and think. My wisdom belongs to Him. I was dust. He has formed my body, and He has created me in His own image."

The Queen lingers for six months, and then wants to go home, but Solomon is not willing to part with this beautiful woman who has come to him from the ends of the earth. He presses her to stay and to live for a time in his palace. She somewhat reluctantly consents, having first obtained from him an oath that he would treat her honorably. Solomon gave the pledge, and at the same time made the Queen swear that she would not touch anything that belonged to him in the palace.

Then the wisest of men resorted to a ruse. He gave the Queen at supper something which made her insensibly thirsty, and she went to the King's room to get some water to quench her thirst. The King sprang up and charged her with breaking her oath, and would only release her on condition that she also release him. The pledge which she had taken seemed preposterous at the time it was demanded, now she understood its meaning. Both the oaths were annulled.

That night the King had a vision. He saw a brilliant sun, which descended from the heavens and which poured its rays over Israel. This brightness lasted a certain time, when the sun fled away. It went and stopped over Ethiopia, where it shone brilliantly for some ages. The King waited for its return to

It is well known that the Emperor Menelik of Abyssinia claims descent from King Solomon and the Queen of Sheba, whose visit to the wisest of Hebrew Kings is so wonderfully described in the Bible.

M. Hugues Le Roux, the distinguished French explorer of Abyssinia, has just discovered, translated and photographed the original Abyssinian or Ethiopian manuscript describing the Queen's visit to King Solomon.

The manuscript is extraordinarily interesting, both because it is a contemporary account of an event recorded in the Bible and because of its beautiful language and imagery. It is much longer than the Biblical account of the Queen's visit given in the First Book of Kings, Chapter X, contains many more details and is written rather from the point of view of the Queen than from that of Solomon. Indeed, it is conjectured that the manuscript may have been written by the Queen herself.

The explorer discovered this manuscript by a happy chance. When he made his last visit to Abyssinia, where he was already well known, the Emperor Menelik sent a learned man—the Tigrean Ato Hailo Mariam—to escort him to the capital. This man, out of friendship for M. Le Roux, told him about the manuscript, showed it to him and assisted him in translating it. The manuscript is entitled "The Keubra

"THE LITTLE ROUND HOLE OF THE PISTOL LOOKED LIKE THE END OF A THIRTEEN-INCH GUN TO HIM. IT IS CERTAIN THAT HE DIDN'T SAY A WORD. HE ONLY LOOKED. IF YOU CAN TELL HOW A MAN IN A MASK DOES LOOK, AND HELD HIS HANDS UP, FILLED WITH UTTER ASTONISHMENT."

IF the whole of Mrs. Charles Gilpin's life were a story, it would be a very strange one. In the meantime, though, she has changed her little life for a time of very serious business, one of which is always ready to be broken by the big town home of the Gilpin 26, at No. 205 Delancey place, in Philadelphia, and the other always ready to be broken by the big town home of the Gilpin 26 at River View; also both houses are so well equipped with burglar alarms and things like that that every body who has a right inside them has to navigate by elaborate codes to keep themselves from thinking themselves house-breakers.

And Mrs. Gilpin's wonderful emerald, and especially the great emerald she bought in Amsterdam, and which the dealer told her came from some old corner in India, are not kept in a place where any one might just casually light upon them. That is not at all likely, but it is particularly about the biggest emerald that the lady's treasure chest.

When you come to think about it, the conduct of the Gilpin 26 in the case seems very reasonable. For if you owned jewels, and particularly emeralds of immense value, and you had to trust a couple of masked burglars with a very early ray pistol, and then wait out some time afterward to visit some friends and found the house had been ransacked when you returned, but not a thing, and then not so long after that had been ransacked mysteriously midnight thieves again, well, you would want to do something to protect yourself, wouldn't you?

So Mrs. Gilpin has turned to diamonds, emeralds, and the emeralds are as well secured as though a magpie had been as bad as hitting them away.

Mrs. Gilpin is one of the beauties of Philadelphia. Her type is of the mysterious, farthest East, with something exorbitant in it, and Mrs. Gilpin, fully recognizing this, repudiates the idea in the guise of her hair.

Before her marriage she was Frederick Herford, one of the striking group of daughters of Henry Herford, the coal baron and multi-millionaire. She is his youngest daughter. One of her sisters married into the German nobility and became the Baroness von Bismarck; another became Mrs. "Bobbie" Strickland, who is an integral part of the smart, bustling set of England and sends her sisters in Monterey in that connection. It is needless to say that the old coal baron when he died left all the big estates and the great money to his daughter.

It has just been suggested that Mrs. Gilpin knows thoroughly how to handle her money and the strange prevailing Eastern charm she possesses she has been able to secure a most successful life. One of the great secrets of most of the money and the strange prevailing Eastern charm she possesses she has been able to secure a most successful life. One of the great secrets of most of the money and the strange prevailing Eastern charm she possesses she has been able to secure a most successful life.

Mrs. Gilpin in Amsterdam was rummaging about a certain famous old jeweler's shop, and she once gave a most marvelous emerald. Mrs. Gilpin desired it at once. The price was high, but not prohibitive for the daughter of Coal King Herford, and she bought it. Naturally she was a bit curious as to its history.

"Where did it come from?" she asked. "From an Englishman," said the old jeweler. "He said he had bought it from a native in India in some place away off the best track."

"It looks as though it might have a history," said Mrs. Gilpin, looking at the great gem intently. "It's probably a temple jewel," the seller told her. "In fact, the Englishman said so much. It belonged to some temple likely enough; probably it was part of one of the gods' ornaments. It may even have been his eye, or one of them rather. Some religious priest may have stolen it and sold it. There is no telling."

"If that was of a god's eye, I would certainly like to have the man to it," said Mrs. Gilpin, earnestly. Then she said the bill and took the jewel. She often wondered about it afterward. She never had it set. Beautiful as the rest of her emeralds are, this was unique and never seemed to change in well with the others. So Mrs. Gilpin 26, with many a wish that she had the older stone, if one there was, let it lie in its solitary glory.

Last Fall, while extensive alterations were going on at their own country home, Mr. and Mrs. Gilpin took Leighton Place, William Edie Scott's country place at Drexelburg. They had not been there very long when Mrs. Gilpin, alone save for a maid, heard a noise downstairs. Mrs. Gilpin in her bedroom listened with some eagerness. After a while she heard a noise outside her door. She couldn't be mistaken—there was some one outside who shouldn't have been inside. The maid rushed collapsed with terror. Not so Mrs. Gilpin. Her emeralds were in the room, but the only thing with which she was not protected there was a little toy revolver, a souvenir of a cousin. Mrs. Gilpin made one quick step and seized the revolver.

Another step and she had thrown wide open the door. There stood straight at her a man with a mask covering all his face. Mrs. Gilpin didn't even hesitate. Quick as a flash she pushed the shining muzzle of the toy right into the man's face.

"Run or you're dead," said Mrs. Gilpin, mechanically. "Run or you're dead," said Mrs. Gilpin, mechanically. "Run or you're dead," said Mrs. Gilpin, mechanically. "Run or you're dead," said Mrs. Gilpin, mechanically. "Run or you're dead," said Mrs. Gilpin, mechanically.

Now two figures running across the lawn of Leighton Place.

Mrs. Gilpin ran down, her pistol still in hand, closed the window through which the two had entered, went back to her room, threw the window on the dressing table and laughed until she cried.

"Why, that pistol couldn't have hurt a fly," she told her husband when she saw him. "And if you could have seen that man's eyes. They were positively tremendous, he was so frightened."

"Could you describe them?" asked her husband.

No, only they seemed to be sort of forward, like a pair of eyes.

And here is the strangest part of all. Although they left in every room plain evidence that they had been there, not a thing had been taken away. The silver plate of the family could have been theirs for the trouble of picking it up, and every other valuable article besides. Not even a hairpin was missing, nor displaced from just where it had been had stuck. It seemed as though the burglars had been looking for some particular thing, and for that only.

Back from Chelsea came the Gilpins and showed the agent that had led them to break the jewel.

"These people weren't after just anything, and that's what was so strange."

And that was the end of the matter. The burglars were perfectly informed of their "They were after some one special thing."

I would give anything in this world for you. I know, dear, you will stay after me asking you to. This week Saturday I will be all alone if you go. I would never have kept up so long only for you. Science Explains How Morbid Cells Are Excited by the Horse. By John A. Wesener, Professor of Pathology in The University of Illinois.

THERE is reasonable scientific ground for believing that the unusual number of divorces and domestic difficulties occurring among men and women deeply interested in horses may be traced to physical effects produced by these animals upon persons closely associated with them.

If men and women in fashionable life, who feel the symptoms of approaching divorce will get away from their horses and go on a diet of cottage cheese, rice bread and cornmeal food, I am convinced that many scandals like those which occurred recently will be avoided.

It is my opinion that the peculiar attraction between the equine and the human, which appears to be particularly potent in the case of fashionable women, is the direct result of the physiological action of certain live cells in the horse upon certain morbid cells in the human being which have been developed by the unnatural life of the subject.

The attraction of the cells of the horse for the morbid cells of the human being is one which draws the persons affected irresistibly away from the objects of their normal affections. Mrs. Sidney C. Love, Who Divorced Her Husband and Married a Horse Trainer.

The action manifests itself in various ways, both internal and external, some of which can only be guessed at. I believe that it causes deep-seated psychological disturbances. It also gives rise to vague physical desires and yearnings, which cannot be satisfied. It causes dissatisfaction with ordinary persons and conditions. Especially is this true of women, who, being of a more delicate and impressionable nervous organization than men, are more easily unbalanced by abnormal influences. The women, who are victims of the morbid cell action, become enamored of the physical beauty of the horse, and thus develop an aversion to their own husbands, who may be insignificant in appearance and not interested in horses. Not infrequently, as we see, the excessive admiration for the horse working a practical outlet is transferred in some degree to a man who is closely associated with horses.

The danger is evidently one that threatens the so-called "society women" of America more than any other class. The average young society man or woman of today is born to a life of luxury, and therefore misses the psychological development that comes of real conquest in the struggle of life—the triumph over obstacles. This psychological deficiency co-operates with the unwholesome action in which I have referred when the critical period arrives.

Constant excitement, lack of sleep, eating out, the faintest and most imprudent of food habits, to bring about the crisis, when the most character of the subject becomes unequal to resist the tendencies of the morbid cells. In the case of a woman who falls into a highly nervous state, becoming irritable and nervous, ready to quarrel with her husband or to commit such acts as the slightest provocation.

Generally speaking, I should say that the average society woman reaches this period somewhere between the ages of thirty and forty, and more frequently never thirty than forty. To counteract the effect that the horse has in such cases, a woman should stay away from the stable as far as possible. She should cease to feed, seek-like, upon the animal perfection around her, and acquire a little more animal perfection of her own through thinking, sleeping and peaceful living.

THE DEVIL CHASERS OF PENNSYLVANIA.

No. 1.—The Death Torture of Little Rena Smith As a Human Sacrifice of the "Devil Chasers."

HAND IN HAND with the highest development of Christian principles—almost in the center of the densest Christian population on this continent—has come the climax of all that is most terrible and blasphemous.

The leader of a new religious sect, claiming to be a descendant, has with his own hands torn the life from the body of a hapless child, making her the victim of a "blood sacrifice."

Human "blood sacrifice" has been the ultimate end of other sects composed of fanatical women and sanguine men on the subject of religion, organized and led by fanatics claiming divine authority; but the "Devil Chasers" of Pennsylvania have actually reached that summit of fanatical savagery.

Little May Irene Smith's mutilated, inflamed body is the visible proof of this horror and in a prison cell at Haverhill, Pa., sits Prophet Robert Bachman, head of the sect of "Devil Chasers," boldly confessing to it.

"Yes, I killed the child. God drove the devil out of her. Now let God crucify me. I can bear my cross."

And the wife of Bachman declares no less boldly: "God, who is my husband, killed the child. He loves the devil out of her. For hours we stood by praying for his victory, and at last he triumphed."

This was no mere human blood sacrifice as Abraham of old contemplated, believing himself commanded by God to offer up his son, Isaac—the evil stroke of the knife. Little "Rena," as her parents called her, was tortured for hours—driven with sticks, her limbs crushed under the prophet's heavy hands, until the remnants of life straggled out of her by her prophet's own hands.

The awful occasion was at 3 a. m. in the prophet's house, lying the greater part of a day and a night, during which the clothes of women were torn from their backs, and the interior and furnishings of the house reduced to chaos, in which were mingled dead dogs, rats and chickens, whose "blood sacrifice" had paved the way for that of the child.

During that night filled with blasphemous horrors, neighbors passing along the road heard the squeaking of furniture, the groans of men and the shrieks of women. Through the windows they could see dimly and half-lit men and women beating and struggling with each other. It was a vision of hellish to see from.

But the prophet was a brother of the richest and most influential man of the community, Dr. Irving A. Bachman, millionaire cement manufacturer, and himself a man of means. His most ardent follower—the father of the murdered child—was Condemned Henry Smith, also a very wealthy man. Short of stature and a sect so well ingrained in a worldly way could hold its empire unchallenged.

Knowledge of the child's death during that orgy made a difference. Then the prophet and his wife, and the father and mother of the murdered child, were arrested. When the coroner and his jury had viewed the mutilated little body, and had visited the dismantled interior of the prophet's house, this verdict was returned:

"May Irene Smith came to her death by strangulation. At the hands of Robert Bachman in the presence of Henry Smith, the father, and of Mabel Smith, the mother."

Of these guilty ones, alone the night of that murderous orgy, only the mother of little Rena appears to have retained to her right mind. Filled with grief and horror, she gave the only uncorrupted statement of the details of that awful night, made to District Attorney McKee:

"Whether it was in the name of religion or not, religion feeling, has murdered my child. I never had any faith in the teachings of the 'Devil Chasers.' Bob has been talking to Henry and me for several weeks about joining, but I always refused."

"I have gone to church regularly and to Sunday school, and have been a good girl. I have never been to any of their meetings. But Henry became impressed and fanatical, and, usually, to keep peace in the family, I agreed. He was always good and kind to me and Rena, and I thought it would do no harm to give in to him."

"There was only one thing that annoyed me. Bob was constantly talking about a blood sacrifice being necessary to purify the converts that had recently joined the 'Devil Chasers.' Henry laughed at my fears and said Bob's utterances were only symbols, and should be taken as many things in the Bible are."

"I know now what he meant. Our little Rena has been the 'blood sacrifice.' If I had only yielded to my next impulse and had left her at home with neighbors she would have been alive today."

But Henry said it would do her no harm to attend the meeting. It breaks my heart now to think that we ever yielded to the little thing the food she craved for on Sunday. None of us cared for anything to eat, we were so hungry by the services. Even I, who had gone there unbelieved, found myself as much impressed as the others."

"They danced, shouted, broke furniture and beat devils out of each other. Some one thought they saw a devil on me, and my best girl went to town. Then I lost the power of reasoning. I thought I heard Rena scream and tried to go to her, but one of the women grabbed me and said, 'Oh, it's only another chicken being offered up.'"

"We had already killed several of Bob's chickens, as well as his cat, dog, and I thought nothing more of it. Then there came a terrible cry above all the others, and I knew then that it was Rena. I rushed into her room where Bob had put her when she called for food, and there was Bob holding her head in a funny way."

"The devil's gone," he yelled to me. "You've killed her," I said, and tried to strike him. But Henry held me back.

"Do not interfere with the mandate of the throne," he said.

"Then I remembered nothing more distinctly until I awoke in this jail."

The father of the little victim—physically a splendid specimen of manhood—wrecked the furnishings of his room in a paroxysm of ravings. The united strength of four guards was barely sufficient to subdue him. When questioned by the District Attorney his gaze was vacant and a signature of unmitigated sentences poured from his mouth. Finally his eyes closed and he slumped:

"It was God's will. Bob knew all about it. Why should a poor sinner like me question the ways of the God of wrath?"

"Bob said there was a devil devouring the soul of Rena. He killed her at God's command. But it will be all right."

"Rena's going to be crucified, and then there will be a glorious coming to all our troubles."

Mrs. Bachman, wife of the prophet, was released on her promise to appear when wanted as a witness. She seemed dazed, and wandered about the streets for two hours before she boarded a car for her mother's home. There she added these details to the terrible story:

"Robert did not think he was God. He became converted, and during the religious frenzy was the second coming of Christ. He believed that Mr. and Mrs. Smith and I were all drunk. He thought the same about the child May. I became confused and for a time could not tell what was going on in the room around me. My husband took the child because he thought the devil was in it and stamped upon it as the floor."

"I could not stop him, because he thought I had the devil in me. He chased Mr. and Mrs. Smith out of the house. They carried the dead child with them. Mr. Smith had one shoe and sticking on, and was forced to leave and run outdoors with his other foot bare. That is all I can remember at the present time."

Little Rena seemed to drive the prophet's demons upon her. She spoke of it to her parents, she would not visit the Bachmans home alone.

Little Rena seemed to drive the prophet's demons upon her. She spoke of it to her parents, she would not visit the Bachmans home alone.

Even after her father and mother became Bachman's converts, the child took care to keep away from the prophet's presence. On the fatal day of the "Devil Chasers" orgy it was with the greatest difficulty that little Rena's parents induced her to accompany them to the Bachmans house.

They had persisted in this at Bachman's command. By the exercise of a strange hypnotic power the prophet compelled Smith to kneel at his feet and worship him. He ordered him to bring his child into the fold, and Smith, now eager to obey the prophet in all things, brought Rena upon his wife to join the "Devil Chasers," which was the only way to bring little Rena into the prophet's hands, short of actual force, so much did she fear him.

Mrs. Smith has told how she was finally persuaded upon to become a convert. The avowal of that orgy brought May Irene Smith to the prophet's house for the first time since he had required to make a "blood sacrifice." It was then only a question of a few hours in which to work himself and his followers up to the necessary frenzy to bring the child to the fate which Bachman had cunningly designed for her.

When, after hours of indescribable confusion in that house, during which nearly everything movable was destroyed, had dogs, cats and chickens "sacrificed," the child cried for food. It was "the devil in her." That was Bachman's cue. "That devil must be beaten and choked out of her."

All the adults present were now too far gone to resist to interfere. The prophet, Robert Bachman, was free to torture the child to death in his self-authored doctrine of "blood sacrifice."

Mrs. Jean Mellon Mitchell, Who Was Crucified by Her Husband.

Rosa Nadie, the Nurse, Who Threw Baby Aaron Into the Ocean.

No. 2.—Crucifixion of a Pretty, Young Wife by Her Fanatical Husband.

IN the palms and on the backs of the hands of Mrs. Jean Mellon Mitchell, of Pittsburgh, Pa., are to be seen the half-healed wounds which remain visible witness of her crucifixion. Because of her skin, red and lustrous, her face crucified by her fanatical husband.

If her screams while the nails were being driven through her hands had not brought rescue to the scene within a few minutes she would not have lived to deny, as she does, that her husband was her crucifier. Familiar with the habit of ill-treated slaves to shield their husbands, however great their sufferings have been, Mrs. Mitchell's denials have little effect upon the minds of the police, who know she to have been in Pittsburgh at the time of the crucifixion.

But the man immediately led to a distant State has been extremely reticent. Mrs. Mitchell is a young and very pretty woman, and it was known that her husband, William Mitchell, was extremely jealous, resenting the slightest attention to his wife from other men. She was fond of company, and as her husband's hours were from home often for days or weeks at a time she was not inclined to make a relict of herself. Besides, she worked and earned money with which to keep up their prettily furnished apartment, and therefore probably felt at liberty to entertain her friends there.

Friends of hers living in the same building knew that the husband's home-comings were usually the occasions of quarrel, due to something that annoyed his jealousy. He was a morose and exacting man, and, while he made no parade of great religious feeling, he often quoted the Bible in teachings of the duty and proper behavior of married women.

There came an evening out with a gay party when the wife was frightened to learn that her husband had been out about town. His friends were gone, and he to the door of the building in which her apartment was. As they left he said:

"I am afraid something dreadful is going to happen."

But they laughed and left her, one of the party, a young woman, going to her own apartment in the same building.

It was after midnight when Mrs. Mitchell left her friends and went alone to her apartment. At some time after 3 o'clock that morning tenants of the building were awakened by a woman's shrieks. One of them was near enough to distinguish the words she uttered between shrieks.

It was the voice of Mrs. Mitchell, whose husband's name it William. Then there were harsh shrieks of a woman in playful agony, punctuated by sobs, as if of a woman in distressing a soul. Then loud laughter, and Mrs. Mitchell was seen, followed by shrieks of apprehension, and the words:

"You've had your revenge, Bill! One hand is enough! Leave my other hand, Oh! Oh! Oh!"

Then sounds of the hammer again—then silence. Thoroughly alarmed for the woman's life, several of the neighbors who had heard the shrieks, rushed to Mrs. Mitchell's door. It was locked. They forced it open. The sitting room and dining room were unoccupied. Mrs. Mitchell's bed had not been touched. Where was she?

When they went to the kitchen a shocking scene met their gaze. The mystery of the shrieks was explained.

The unconscious form of Mrs. Mitchell hung, back down, over the edge of the sink, her hands outstretched against the inclined board at the back. What held her in that unnatural position?

Her hands were nailed to the board. From the bottom of each hand emerged the head of a large nail, and through the wounds blood was oozing. Near by, on the kitchen table lay a new hammer—evidently the hammer with which the nails had been driven.

Unconscious, Mrs. Mitchell was the figure of a woman who was with the play of recovery fainting at the dreadful sight. Only a few moments before she had parted with the victim, after a evening of amusement, and heard her voice her own excitement of approaching matrimony.

Robert Bachman, "the Prophet," Who Made a Human Sacrifice of Little Rena Smith.

The men of the party, seeing that the victim of the tragedy was still dead, made haste to release her. With the hammer they drew the nails from the bleeding palms. Blood driven into hand, the task was performed with difficulty. Laid upon her bed, Mrs. Mitchell was soon restored to consciousness.

In the hospital to which Mrs. Mitchell was taken it was feared that blood poisoning would result from the piercing of her palms by those rough nails. But she escaped that fate and was discharged in a few days.

She returned to her apartment, but has since manifested no desire for the society of her old companions, preferring to lead a secluded life, although there apparently was not the least likelihood of her husband appearing to molest her again.

In this regard she may be wiser than the police. While they consider him merely a criminal of extremely brutal tendencies, perhaps she knows that to be a religious fanatic who would not hesitate to repeat that act of crucifixion if he suspected that she was desecrated it.

Making the Deadly Lance-Head Give Up His Most Remarkable Snake on Earth

Venom, Which Cures Insanity, Described By the Man Who Squeezed the Reptile.

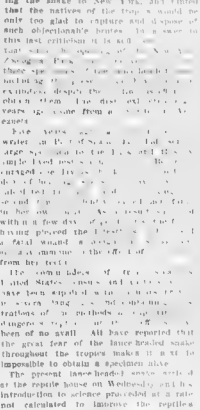

An extraordinary controversy has followed the exciting operation of extracting the venom from a lance-headed snake, which is used by homeopathic physicians as a remedy for insanity, various nervous diseases, diphtheria and dangerous forms of L. Ditmars, curator of reptiles at this institution. The lance-head is one of the rarest and most poisonous of snakes.

The object of securing the venom was to make from it a preparation called "lance-head," which is used by homeopathic physicians as a remedy for insanity, various nervous diseases, diphtheria and dangerous forms of L. No. XXVII.—The Teddy Bears' Birthday (Continued)

Verses by Seymour Eaton. Drawings by E. H. Twelveteers

Copyright, 1908, by Seymour Eaton.

TEDDY-G replied in his sweetest way:
 "I'm at your service, Miss, to-day
 To help you look with greatest care
 To find one birthday and one Bear."
 Then TEDDY-B nodded up to say
 That he would help his best that day.

The refreshments o'er they all went out
 And chased each other all about;
 Played hide-and-seek from tree to tree
 And danced and sang so merrily
 That the Teddy Bears tell to this day
 Of that evening spent in the month of May;

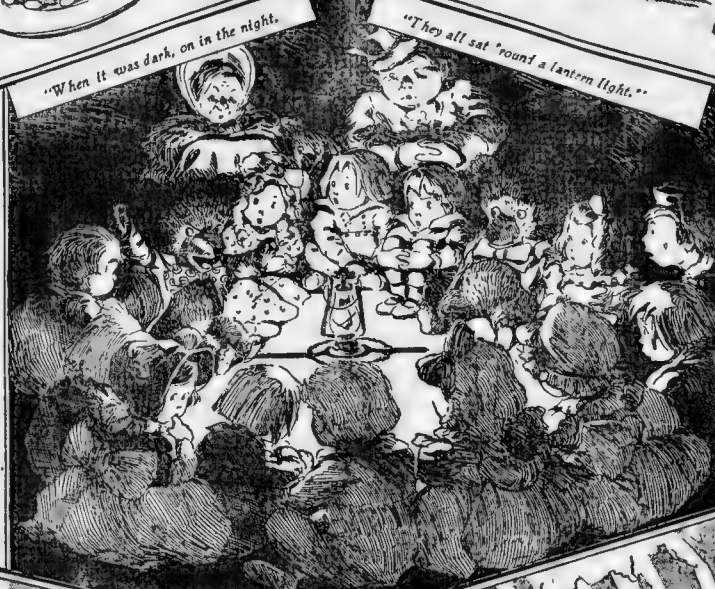

"On the dining table the gifts were laid,
 The funniest things that were ever made."

To share with each good lass and lad
 The happiest birthday he ever had.
 The Bears shook hands and said that they Would like such birthdays every day.

On the dining table the gifts were laid,
 The funniest things that were ever made.
 For each had brought a gift or two,
 Some things quite old and others new.
 They cleared the floor and began to play
 And to celebrate in the jolliest way,
 With blind-man's-buff and games like that,
 And button-button and cornered-cat.

"With blindman's buff, and games like that,
 And button-button and cornered-cat."

"When it was dark, on in the night,
 They all sat 'round a lantern light."

"They all sat 'round a lantern light."

"They cleared the floor and began to play
 And to celebrate in the jolliest way."

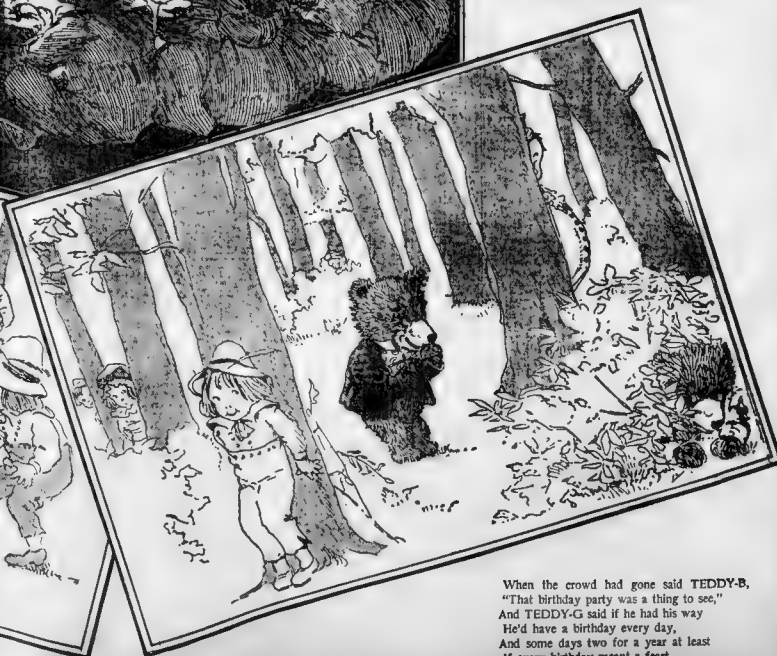

The very best right from their birth
 In all their travels round the earth.

When it was dark, on in the night,
 They all sat 'round a lantern light
 In a happy ring, both young and old,
 And recited poems and stories told,
 And sang Lang Syne with such heart and soul
 That Father Graybeard and Old King Cole
 Both wept with joy they felt so glad
 As they thought of birthdays they had had.

"Played hide-and-seek from tree to tree
 And danced and sang so merrily."

They had baskets filled with things to eat,
 And the girls fixed up the sweetest treat
 For the Teddy Bears, on a silver dish,
 Some mushrooms fried and roasted fish.
 And pigeon pie and nuts and cake
 And silver things that mothers bake.

When the crowd had gone said TEDDY-B,
 "That birthday party was a thing to see,"
 And TEDDY-G said if he had his way
 He'd have a birthday every day,
 And some days two for a year at least
 If every birthday meant a feast.

BULLS LIFT ABOVE HIGH MARKS

Railroad Shares Hold Centre of Stage in Heavy Trading Boom.

COPPERS REMAIN QUIET

More than the usual amount of attention was lavished on the stock market yesterday, and trading was of a very active nature. Prices were above throughout the day, and there were some securities in which new high levels for this year were reached. In a few scattered instances the bull movement attained such momentum that it carried prices above those of 1907—the boom year for stocks.

The stock market seems to be widely in the hands of the bulls. Since or twice during the week there were some reactions noticeable, as on Friday, but these movements toward lower prices were of short duration, and a recovery was in order almost before the bulls realized that the market was in their hands. There could be no more public participation without having taken the bull by the horns. Some of the securities which were a few weeks ago, they are still far from satisfied.

There was talk of short interests being liquidated in the market over night, and it was understood that many market makers had looked for lower prices because of the rum in the tide on Friday. It was evidently one of the chief reasons why the stock market yesterday presented such a boom.

A few from the copper group will still close on the top of the day, although what looked like a boom in the copper market yesterday was not a boom in the copper market. There was a "bulling" done in the railroad stocks, and a "bulling" done in the copper stocks. In fact, the copper stocks were not so much in the hands of the bulls as the railroad stocks. In the early hour of the market, a few of the copper stocks were in the hands of the bulls, and they were not so much in the hands of the bulls as the railroad stocks.

Bank Loans Increase.

The bank statement, while not as good as it has been in previous weeks, was still fairly encouraging. During the week the bank loans increased $4,772,000, and there was a gain in the deposits of $4,808,000. The statement of the bank loans was not so good as it has been in previous weeks, but it was still fairly encouraging. During the week the bank loans increased $4,772,000, and there was a gain in the deposits of $4,808,000.

The stock trading was more scattered yesterday than it has been lately, and it was not confined to one or two securities. The market was in the hands of the bulls, and there were some securities in which new high levels for this year were reached. In a few scattered instances the bull movement attained such momentum that it carried prices above those of 1907—the boom year for stocks.

Copper Still Quiet.

Those who follow the market in this city have been completing of late of the way in which the local exchange falls to catch the spring that is in New York. This condition is due more to the fact that the major part of the copper trade is in the hands of the bulls, and they are not so much in the hands of the bulls as the railroad stocks. In the early hour of the market, a few of the copper stocks were in the hands of the bulls, and they were not so much in the hands of the bulls as the railroad stocks.

Corn Shows Boom.

Atlanta opened at 1 1/2, but before the close had been going so very low a good demand sprang up and there were many buyers. Just after the close the market was in the hands of the bulls, and there were some securities in which new high levels for this year were reached. In a few scattered instances the bull movement attained such momentum that it carried prices above those of 1907—the boom year for stocks.

Mr. Whitten, N. H., May 10, Mrs. Louise Whitten of this town, formerly of Lynn, Mass., and a graduate of Lynn High School, in the very act of obtaining a permit to fish in Wapunagesset waters, on account of the fact that she had been told that she could picket. Her record of two trout at the same place, and the fact that she had a reputation about here for her marked success in picking, was the cause of her being refused a permit.

Mrs. Whitten is the wife of Eugene Frank Whitten of the Boston & Maine railroad. She married her on account of Mr. Whitten's running schedule in the Boston & Maine railroad. She is a native of Lynn, and the lake is indelible in one of her favorite haunts.

With other pole or line, in open water, or through the reeds, Mrs. Whitten is equal to any fisherman. She has been known to catch lake trout when the temperature was below 40° and the water was very shallow. Below town, chopped a hole through the reeds, and caught a lake trout weighing from six to eight pounds.

She is a very good angler, too, as are her fishermen of Rockport. Mass., can tell you. She has been known to catch a lake trout weighing from six to eight pounds. She was living in Lynn, and pulled in many a big fish from the ocean.

The new monument which has just been dedicated to the memory of the father of the late Patrick A. Collins, former Mayor of Boston, by his widow, has been favorably commented upon by the friends of the distinguished orator and statesman who have seen it, because of its extreme beauty.

On the middle panel of the cross of the monument is the inscription:

The monument is nine feet high with a granite base seven by two feet. The main shaft is of Tennessee marble, upon the face of which is cut a Celtic cross. In the cross is placed a bronze bust of Mr. Collins, which was made by Cyrus E. House, sculptor. The bust is a remarkably good reproduction of the face of the dead man.

The features of Mr. Collins appear in the shadow of the cross and the
